ALL THE WORLD'S A-WISHING

By WINONA GODFREY.

(Copyright, 1910, by the Pearson Publishing Co.)

Geraldine came as honestly by her romantic temperament as she did by her esthetic name, for her mother having given her the latter, by the same token very likely bestowed the former also. But Mrs. Sears had forgotten that she was ever romantic, and "Geraldine," too, had quickly yielded to the exigencies of every-day life and become simple "Jerry."

At six twenty, Jerry emerged from the employee's entrance at Hathaway & Eaton's, drifted with the tide of girls to the next corner, and there detached herself to wait for Elmer Pierce. She and Elmer were engaged, and she was going home to supper with him as she was in the habit of doing, once in a while.

The change from the overheated store into the fresh wind made her shiver a little, and she looked rather impatiently up and down the wet street. A big automobile had just drawn up to the curb a few feet from her; the chauffeur had alighted and was standing beside it. The car, a limousine, was one of those shining, monogrammed, luxurious affairs that to Jerry always typified the vague "rich."

"Been waitin' long, Jerry?" asked Elmer at her shoulder. "Not long," Elmer's hand on her elbow propelled her into the stream again. "Guess the big bugs have taken to drivin' their own cars," he commented, glancing back at the still motionless machine.

"Who was it?" Jerry's tone was carefully careless. "Pomeroy," replied Elmer with the easy familiarity of the half-informed. "The new millionaire, you know. His dad struck it in Alaska, and now he's havin' fun blowin' it. What was he eyelin' you for?" with sudden recollection.

"Aw, he wasn't," Jerry denied coldly, and Elmer did not press the matter. Elmer was a slender little chap not much taller than Jerry herself, and rather handsome in a boyish way. Jerry and he had known each other since they were children and she had gone but little with any other man. They had been engaged for nearly a year without much being said about the wedding day.

Elmer now began a string of familiar small talk about the happenings of the day, full of "I asked 'ims" and "he says." Jerry did not respond as usual with the courtesy of the wait-station; her thoughts kept turning back to—was it Pomeroy's—eyes. There had been something in them that made the blood dash deliciously through her veins in a new and strange intoxication. Pomeroy, the new millionaire, she had heard talk of him, had seen his name in the newspapers. What was it about him—

"Here we are," Elmer announced. They climbed two flights of cabbage-scented, carpetless stairs, and entered the tiny flat where Elmer and his mother lived. There were three small rooms—a "parlor," kitchen and bedroom—Mrs. Pierce and Elmer ate in the kitchen when alone, but the table was brought into the parlor when here was company. Elmer slept in his room on a couch.

Mrs. Pierce called "Hello" from the kitchen where she was frying chops, and Jerry mechanically laid off her hat and jacket, and mechanically, too, she took part in the conversation of the supper-table, and the hour and a half afterward that she stayed.

An odd depression weighed her spirits, lightened occasionally by equally strange flashes of excitement. She seemed to see Elmer, his mother and her home, with a new and terrifying penetration, as if some miraculous clearness of vision had been suddenly vouchsafed her. She had never thought much about Mrs. Pierce before, beyond the fact that she was a kind, motherly sort of woman, now she noted her eager way of watching Elmer and a certain anxious setting of the lips. She thought she detected in the older woman a pathetic anxiety to please the young people, and Jerry suddenly understood.

Elmer's mother feared that when Elmer married, he would no longer need her—she was afraid he would no longer think of her. For the first time, Jerry could not bear to imagine herself married to Elmer—she could not bear to think of life here. Her cheeks began to burn. She sprang up.

"I must go now," "Why, it ain't late, Jerry," said Mrs. Pierce. Jerry insisted, however, and Elmer got his hat to go with her. In the dim hall, he paused a moment. "One of the four-room flats on the top floor is vacant," he whispered meaningly.

Jerry felt a chill in her veins. "Is it?" She went on down the stairs. "I think I can get raised to fifteen the first of Jan.," he continued, taking her arm as they turned up the street. "I hope you can," she forced herself to say.

"You seem tickled to death," cried Elmer, aggrieved. "That's enough to get married on, ain't it?" She did not reply directly. "What does your mother think about it?" she asked after a moment.

Elmer was amazed. "Mother. Why, ain't we takin' the four-room flat to have room for her?" The biggest of the four "rooms" was about eight by ten.

"And there's my mother," continued Jerry slowly. "Gee whiz! what's that got to do with it? What's got into you tonight, girlie? You haven't been yourself all evening." He regarded her anxiously.
